

Dear MeetEdgar,

I really enjoyed the video you put together about working for your company. I love that:

- You authentically figure out if someone is a good fit
- You understand how working remotely actually works
- You are bootstrapping your business

This creates good constraints. I'm very glad you're handling things this way.

I'm currently building systems at Nuvi, a social media analytics company. We have a publishing product as well. Our stack is Rails 4, Ruby 2.2, Heroku, Postgres, S3, Sidekiq + Redis using ES6 and React.js on the front-end. I copied that from your job post because we are literally using the same stack, and it's working well for me.

I've worked remotely for more than 10 years, convinced myself that it wasn't as important, and am sadly reminded how much I gave up by going into an office today. I decided to go ahead and move to a position that is remote again. I love that this is not only how you find workers, but central to the DNA of your company.

Anyway, I think most of the rest of me is fairly discoverable. I just realized how enviable your situation is and didn't want to be lost in the pile of applicants.

Thanks,

David
